Preface

To facilitate creation of new knowledge through research, we need to provide easy and exhaustive access to the knowledge available in libraries and databases. Acute proliferation and complexity of knowledge makes organization and subsequent retrieval a complex and demanding task, while unprecedented growth and diversity of knowledge has created many challenges and opportunities for the library and information services profession. Subject access to information becomes ever more crucial. Therefore, the potential of information storage and retrieval systems cannot be exploited fully without properly designed and efficient subject catalogues. Information needs of users are complex, requiring new temporal and conceptual linkages to information. This calls for new insights and dexterity on the part of information services professionals in order to collect, analyze, describe, represent, and retrieve intellectual knowledge through our systems.

Subject headings work, although based on long-standing rules and principles, often turns out to be an art or an intuitive craft. At times, the creation of subject headings is intellectual work of first order in library and information services.

A list of subject headings is the pivotal element in complex information processing and retrieval systems. The structure of the bibliographic file depends upon subject headings, which in
